

The university's 2021 Postament reading for yesterday, Sunday the 27th March 2021, was in Section 24.25-26.

Today is International Women's Day, a day we should be normally celebrating, the contributions, strengths, and roles women play in our homes, societies, and the world at large. However, under the current circumstances, we women as women are subjected to gross gender based violence.

We are now an accustomed, trained to living with masks on our faces. We are accustomed to living with a greater degree of inconspicuousness as we come in and out of our congregations and in our homes. It is an easy matter of concealing, the real or behind the masks. Covering up for the people not to see the real happenings in our faces is what we do. The irony that we have is to really maskly who we are meeting up with, despite having known them for years even as we see the mask in their eyes. It is a struggle to see the expressions on their faces and gauge their mood, whether they are grateful to see us. It is even more glib to know how to approach and meet as the person approaches. We only rely on what comes out of their mouth which, sometimes, is also difficult to tell whether the person is thrilled to see you. We do not know whether we are to receive the good news or the
